In Dubai, developers turn mortgage providers

Banker reluctance is creating an opportunity for developers to sell and lend

By Sam Bridge

f tw st wh

Last week, another Dubai developer, Samana, said it would offer 30 per cent financing for buyers of its soon-to-launch project in Dubai Studio City. How has the payment plan stretched to 30 years?

UAE Central Bank push

It is surprising that more developers choose to do the lending on their own, more so at a time when the UAE Central Bank has withdrawn the 30 per cent upper limit on banks' exposure to the real estate sector. Plus, interest rates had dropped in the recent past, so much so mortgages are in the 3.7-3.9 per cent range.

And yet, prospective homeowners find it's nowhere near easy to secure funding from banks. It could be the state of the economy that's leaving banks to remain cautious, especially as job losses across key sectors have piled up.

Stretched plans

In the last two years, developers in the city have been going full throttle with post-handover plans, when they require only a small upfront payment. But many of these projects will take at least three years on average to complete - and this phase can prove a real burden for the buyer.
